

Opening
in 1969

Livingston College

A New Division of Rutgers
The State University
at New Brunswick

Rutgers • The State University is building a new college in New Brunswick:

Livingston, a coeducational, residential, contemporary-minded liberal arts college. Its walls are rising, its faculty is gathering, and it is eagerly awaiting its first students in September 1969. They will share in the excitement of developing a rapidly growing institution that will combine the best of two worlds for its students and faculty—all the advantages of the large and of the smaller educational community.

In its need to expand, Rutgers University has chosen to add this College, and others in the years to come, instead of enlarging its present New Brunswick residential colleges, Douglass and Rutgers. All of these medium-sized colleges will join together to provide the full advantages of a major academic institution, yet each will remain flexible and adaptable to the needs of its students and faculty in a changing world.

At Livingston great emphasis will be put on the student's independence in developing his individual curriculum. In close contact with his faculty, he may choose a conventional study path or a more individually designed program to satisfy his interests and to meet the exacting standards of a University degree program.

Livingston students and faculty will be deeply involved in a study of the problems of the contemporary world. They will examine it in the light of the past and consider its future, with particular interest in the growth of the world's cities and in the challenges of an ever-advancing technology.

Livingston students will also be encouraged to take an active part in the shaping of the College itself, and one day each of them will be able to look back in time and say: "I was there and I helped to make it what it is." We look forward to that partnership.

Frank Grad & Sons
Anderson, Beckwith & Haible
Associated Architects and Engineers

Academic program

In an academic program that will give students much freedom to develop their own intellectual interests, the College will offer a great variety of courses in the sciences, social studies, and humanities, and will introduce courses in such exciting new fields as computer sciences, anthropology, urban studies, and Asian languages. Its students may take courses at Douglass and Rutgers Colleges, and at the Colleges of Engineering and of Agriculture and Environmental Sciences.

The educational experience at Livingston will not be confined to the classroom, the laboratory, and the library. The curricula will be designed to combine formal and informal, on- and off-campus activities, and ideas and methods learned in the classroom will be tested in the community by

- participation in community projects
- internships in public and private agencies
- work and study projects abroad

These activities will help the students to become informed and responsible critics of their society, thinking for themselves and aware of their responsibility to take part constructively in the rapid changes of the world around them.

Certain courses at the College will bring together points of view from more than one field of knowledge and will include an interchange of ideas from teachers of different subjects—all to help students understand complex problems through a simultaneous consideration of different subjects that are relevant to our lives. Thus, in whatever direction a student's interest moves, he will be receiving a uniquely broad education that will relate to his life in the world beyond the campus.

Campus life

The Livingston campus will present a varied and stimulating setting for a community of students and faculty. Residences and classrooms, faculty offices and snack bar, lounges and dining rooms—all will be close together to encourage contact and communication.

Several large coeducational residence units, divided into smaller houses for about fifty men or women students, will combine the closeness and comfort of the small group with the social advantages of the large college community. Each large residence unit will have its own library and a variety of other facilities for study and recreation.

Campus life for Livingston students will grow out of their own initiative in arranging activities of all kinds and in developing an environment that reflects their curiosity and creativity. Students and faculty will be partners, working together in this venture in living education.

Livingston College

A typical house—double and single rooms for about 50 men or women, ten to twelve to a floor, with common rooms for discussion and entertainment.

An entrance to the residence library—50,000 volumes for reference, reserve and recreation.

A residence group—ten houses with library, faculty apartment, common rooms.

Faculty and graduate student offices, classrooms, language laboratory, lecture hall.

Dining halls, lounges, music room, commiser area, game rooms, snack bars.

Typical house floor

Five double student rooms and a single are arranged around a central bathroom. On the ground floor the house has a common living room and a study with a small kitchenette.

Rutgers in New Brunswick

Admission

The Committee on Admissions of Livingston College will consider young men and women of varied talents and interests who appear to be well-prepared and strongly motivated and who indicate an ability to profit from the College's varied opportunities. The Committee will utilize the general admission requirements of the University in making its selection. At present, admission to the University is competitive.

Costs

Tuition at Livingston College, like that of the other divisions of the University will be $200 per term for New Jersey residents and $318 per term for non-residents. Although specific costs for room, board, and student fees have not yet been determined, it is expected that they will be comparable to those of Rutgers and Douglass Colleges. The total cost for residents of New Jersey living on campus at these colleges for the school year 1967-1968, including books, laundry, and incidentals, is approximately $1,900.

Financial aid

Financial assistance will be available for accepted students at Livingston College. Awards will be made on the basis of academic qualifications and demonstrated financial need. The various forms of financial aid available include scholarships, federal grants, and loans. Residents of New Jersey are reminded that New Jersey State Scholarships may be used at Livingston College; however, applications must be made to the New Jersey State Scholarship Commission, 225 West State Street, Trenton, New Jersey 08608.

Application material for September 1969 admission will be available after October 1, 1968. Specific information may be obtained by writing to:
University Office of Admissions
Rutgers—The State University
New Brunswick, New Jersey 08903.